Completion of water treatment of North Dakota sand and gravel wastewater using ferric chloride oxidation. Six pilot-scale sand and gravel pits located in the Missouri River Basin in North Dakota were selected to evaluate the feasibility of treating in-pit wastewater using ferric chloride oxidation to remove organic matter, using the completed operation as a demonstration for treatment of secondary wastewater. The pits were operated with several different treatment systems. Each system received raw wastewater from a pit and was designed to produce a wastewater treatment system. Completion of the secondary wastewater treatment system was a successful result of treatment. Sand and gravel from the pits received solids removal efficiencies of 93-100% and chemical oxygen demand (COD) removal efficiencies of 75-95%. Phosphorus and total nitrogen (TN) removal efficiencies were variable. In-pit aerobic treatment was completed in approximately 8 h for one of the pits. The COD, TN, and phosphorus removal efficiencies were achieved at a cost of about $5/m<sup>3</sup> for treatment of a secondary municipal wastewater system. in this study can be utilized as a valid option to address the emotional disturbances in patients with chronic pain.
